

Recipe for Disaster

Let's see what we can whip up today. First, take one car, mix with an overconfident driver and marinate in dust on a road frequented by logging trucks. Mix in some speed and a dash of poor judgment, then skewer on a large log ... and voila, there you have it ... a Sheesh-car-bob.

This accident combined the right ingredients. The driver was familiar with the road and knew there were logging trucks, but his judgment was so poor he didn't think to slow it down ... even when he entered a thick dust cloud. By the time he saw the truck, it was too late. The car was speared, slid up 21 feet of log and got jammed in the bumper of the truck. Fortunately, this driver wasn't killed instantly, and was able to jump out as the truck driver, unaware something had happened, kept on going for a couple more miles.

Hey, all you roadrunners out there, just 'cause you have a gas pedal and it'll go to the floor doesn't mean you have to put it there. If visibility is diminished due to dust, fog, rain, snow, or whatever, slow it down so you have enough time to STOP when you see something appear in front of you.
